Since the outbreak of the war the Government has had stationed off Clifton, Staten Island, near Quarantine, one or more destroyers to prevent any vessels that have not properly cleared from leaving the port. All steamships, American included, are supposed to display their signal letters. Many vessels have been overhauled by a destroyer and forced to come back to anchorage at Clifton for ignoring the order.

The British steamship City of Madras, which cleared on Monday for Singapore and steamed down the bay and anchored north of Quarantine, made a swift run for the open last night with all lights out. She probably was fearful of submarine attack in the near neighborhood. When the commander of the destroyer saw the lightness freighter rushing by without displaying signals the Sterrett whistled to the City of Madras to stop, but she kept right on. The Sterrett got under way in a pifty and bounded after the British merchantman, overhauling her off the Ambrose Channel lightship and forcing her to come back to Clifton.

It is believed the destroyer had orders and forcing her to come back to Curton.

It is believed the destroyer had orders supplementary to the old and usual ones; that is, she is also expected to keep a sharp lookout at this particular time for vessels that might be taking out sup-plies to the German submarine. That may have been one of the reasons the City of Madras got into trouble, Her skipper must have known that he should have displayed his signals in passing the
